A Bell Telephone Laboratories engineer inspects a model of the Telstar communications satellite. The room, lined with foam plastic to absorb radio energy, simulates the radio environment of space so that engineers can test the antennas. A similar satellite will be orbited by the Bell Telephone System sometime this summer.

The Bell Telephone System within the next few months will put into outer space a small metal sphere that could bring a new era in communications.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration will furnish the three-stage Delta missile that shoots the satellite into orbit from Cape Canaveral, Florida.

Through ground station equipment at Andover, Maine, Bell System scientists will make the most forward-reaching experiments in communications yet done in space.

"Someday as a result of this experimentation," said Dabney, Southern Bell Telephone's manager here, "a system of communications satellites orbiting thousands of miles above the earth will probably carry a big portion of overseas telephone calls and also bring live television from England, France and other countries of the world into your living room."

The Bell System will pay the entire cost of the estimated $3 million dollar launching.

Should the shot fail, a back-up shot will follow within two months.

A second shot may follow later in the year if necessary to complete the experimental program.

Describing Telstar I, Mr. Dabney said that the satellite will receive, amplify and transmit radio microwaves for television, telephone and other types of communications.

Echo I, a large, balloon-like satellite still in orbit, cannot amplify radio signals. Its large reflecting surface acts as a mirror to bounce the signals back to ground stations.

Telstar I, a 170-pound sphere with a 34-inch diameter, will contain 2,500 semiconductor and a single special vacuum tube. To power the satellite's radio equipment are 3,600 tiny solar batteries attached to its surface.

The satellite will go into an elliptical orbit, reaching 3,500 miles at its highest point and dropping 875 miles at its lowest.
Once aloft, it will act as a booster tower high in space for ground microwave stations.

In first tests, Telstar I will receive and transmit back to earth the television and telephone signals from A. T. & T.'s $10 million earth stations near Andover, Maine. Ground receivers at Andover and Holmdel, N. J. will pick up the amplified signals.

Experimental communications will be conducted from Andover and Holmdel, N. J. will pick up the amplified signals.

4-H ORIGINATOR

The nation's 4-H Club move-

1907 in Holmes County when a club for boys was started. The movement quickly spread throughout the South and later the nation under the name of 4-H Clubs. Mississippi leadership paved the way for this splendid youth movement.
